

CHAPTER 2 (BASIC BRIEFING: DEVELOPING AN INITIAL STRATEGY FOR MANAGING CASES):

In italics below, you will find some thoughts from the author about ways you might have responded to this chapter's practice exercises. If you responded differently, you may have had good reason for doing so. Take the author's ideas as food for further thought as you develop your legal reading skills.

Practice Exercises:

A. Read the following case [Leichtman v. WLW Jacor Communications, Inc., reprinted in part beginning on or near p. 28 of the main text] and answer the questions that follow:

1. Is this an edited or unedited case? How do you know?

This is an edited case. I know it's been changed from the original because there are ellipses (. . .) in several places, indicating that something has been omitted.

2. In what geographic region was this case decided? How do you know?

This case was decided in the Midwest. I know because the citation to the case shows that the Court of Appeals of Ohio decided the case.

3. What was the general view of smoking as a health issue at the time this opinion was written? How do you know?

I don't know for sure what the general view of smoking was as a health issue, but I can pretty much guess that around 1994 people were very much aware of the connection between lung cancer and smoking. I think restaurants were beginning to have separate smoking areas, some states were mandating separate smoking areas, and "Thank You for Not Smoking" signs were commonly found. From my own memory, I know that the Surgeon General's warning had long been on cigarette packages, that litigation against major tobacco companies was pending, and that people were no longer uncomfortable asking others not to smoke in their presence.

4. On a separate sheet of paper write a brief for this case.

Each individual's brief will be slightly different and should reflect your understanding of the case and the primary things you want to remember about it

5. What was the most difficult part of writing that brief for you? What made writing that part of the brief difficult?

Again, each individual's answer will be different. A typical answer might be that writing the procedural history was difficult for me to write, but would have been a lot easier if I'd read the end of the case first. Another student might write that it was difficult to write the fact statement because it took too long.

B. Read the sample brief (below) that I wrote for this case. How does this brief compare to yours? How are they different? Are the differences meaningful or superficial? Are there things you would do differently if you had the opportunity to do your brief again?

TORTS – Battery (p. 42)¹

Leichtman v. WLW Jacor Communications, Inc.
Ct. of Appeals of Ohio (1994)

Π: Leichtman (antismoking advocate)

Δ: WLW Jacor Comm. (radio co.) (& Furman? & Cunningham?)

PH: (1) Π filed complaint based in battery;
(2) Δ filed motion to dismiss that trial court granted;
(3) This court (ct. of app.) reversed dismissal on the battery claim.

F: Π, an antismoking advocate, appeared on Δ’s radio talk show to discuss smoking and one of the company’s other talk show hosts blew cigar smoke repeatedly in his face.

Q: Does the Π have a claim for battery based on these facts? In other words, can being “hit” with smoke ever constitute a battery?

H: Yes. Smoke is tangible enough to constitute an offensive contact.

Rule: Contact which is “offensive” to a “reasonable sense of personal dignity” is offensive contact.

R: Smoke (as “particulate matter”) can make contact and, here, blowing smoke in Π’s face could be sufficiently offensive to be a battery. The amount of damages can be negligible (even $1) and still be a battery.

My thoughts: Note that the company itself would not be liable for an employee’s intentional tort (outside the scope of employment), but the other host might be if he encouraged or incited the act. Note also that this court didn’t reach the question of whether smoking around someone would always constitute a battery.

You might have written that your brief was different in that you stated the rule more narrowly, but understood what I did and that both statements led to the same place. Or you might have noticed that my fact statement is very short. Or you might have noticed that I put much more energy into my own thoughts than perhaps you did. Or it might be that your brief was substantially the same as mine.

As you think about writing your briefs, remember that they will be most helpful to you if they are, indeed, brief. You don't want to focus on unnecessary minutia, but you do want to remember that examples from the facts in the cases we read are how we eventually discern patterns in the law.
